THE EPISTLE OF ST. PAUL TO THE GALATIANS. By R. A. Cole.

Prof. Cole, the author of this commentary, was formerly a member of the staff at Trinity College in Dublin and Oak Hill Theological College, London. He also taught at Moore Theological College in Sydney, Australia. At present he is a missionary with the Overseas Missionary Fellowship of the China Inland Mission and is working in Malaysia. His volume on Galatians is the second which he has contributed to the Tyndale series.

In his Preface the author speaks of the letter to the Galatians as "a statement of Paul's Gospel which is also that of the Church universal" and characterizes it as "spiritual dynamite." In his Introduction the author gives fair, adequate and objective treatment to the usual critical questions involved in a study of the epistle. For instance, he examines the North and South Galatian theories fairly and comes to the conclusion that "It seems likely that the letter was written to the Christians of the southern cities."

The treatment given the epistle in the commentary proper is thorough and scholarly. Wherever difficulties occur in the text, the author recognizes them and acknowledges them as such, e.g., whether Titus was circumcized or not. In our estimation the author has avoided the two extremes of excessive detail and of insufficient treatment of the text. Another strength of the commentary is that it is not unduly technical with adequate treatment nevertheless being given all pertinent problems. For those unacquainted with the Greek language, Greek words have been transliterated into English.

In summary, Cole's Galatians is based on solid Biblical scholarship. It is a good commentary and we recommend it. Pastors will want to have it on their shelves alongside other commentaries on St. Paul's "cry for Christian freedom."

The study manual on the epistles of Peter by E. C. Cochrane grew out of lectures to college classes and a Bible class. Its purpose therefore is not to offer a lengthy critical and technical commentary on every single verse of the epistles. Sections are discussed briefly with emphasis on important points. The interpretation is based on the original text and significant Greek words are transliterated for the ordinary reader. The author's viewpoint may be described as conservative. The manual contains a number of fine statements on such subjects as: the Petrine authorship of the epistles, Christ the foundation of the Church, the agreement of Peter and Paul on justification, the impossibility of another chance of salvation after death, the inspiration of Scripture, Christ as the substitute for sinners. Concerning destructive higher criticism the author states: "Destructive, critical scholarship is not one whit higher or more intelligent than evangelical scholarship" (p. 70).

On the other hand the following conclusions and views of the author should be noted. Concerning St. Peter the author concludes: "He did not even possess the insight sufficient to understand deep spiritual things of Paul, 2 Peter 3:15-16" (p. 18). In his discussion of 1 Peter 3:18-19 the author seems to prefer the interpretation that the "spirits" mentioned are not disembodied spirits but human beings and that the passage therefore applies to the preaching of the Holy Spirit through Noah to the antediluvian world (pp. 51-52). It is true he does not advance this view dogmatically since he regards this passage as one of the most perplexing statements of the New Testament. He also sees a connection between this passage and 4:16. The author sees no reference to individuals in the term "elect" in I, 1:1 and introduces a quotation with apparent approval that "election does not carry with it the final salvation of the individual" (p. 29). Finally, in writing of baptism I, 1:21 and alluding to Romans 6:3 he declares: "The water represents in each of these figures the evil life which we leave behind. It does not express the instrument through which we receive the grace of God" (p. 52).

Nevertheless, for a rapid review of the epistles of St. Peter the discriminating reader will find helpful material in this study manual.

This volume contains a reprint of a series of articles that appeared in The Expository Times between 1962-65 under the caption: "Theologians of Our Time." Each well known author was designated the assignment of writing an appreciation of a contemporary theologian whom he greatly admired.

In the preface the editors state that the volume does not claim "to include all theologians who have made contributions of special importance to theological thought in our time, but we cannot pretend that the list is complete, or that it includes all the names we should have liked to include."

Altogether twenty-one theologians are discussed. From Great Britain the following were chosen: John Oman, John Baillie, Donald Baillie, C. H. Dodd, Vincent Taylor and Thomas Manson. From the European continent the selection includes: Karl Heim, Karl Barth (his position today), Emil Brunner, Rudolf Bultmann, Oscar Cullmann, Joachim Jeremias, Karl Rahner, Heinz Schürmann, Friedrich Rehkoph, Ernst Küsemann, and Günther Bornkamm. Scandinavia is represented by Gustav Aulen and Anders Nygren. Those from the United States include Reinhold Niebuhr, Paul Tillich and John Knox.

In this volume the order differs from the original series, otherwise the articles are substantially the same. It should be noted that the article on Reinhold Niebuhr by President John C. Bennett, published by the Seabury Press, was not a part of the original series. The average length of these appreciations is about nine or ten pages. The twenty-one theologians chosen are either New Testament scholars or systematicians, not one Old Testament scholar was deemed worthy of inclusion.

The book will be welcomed by those readers of The Expository Times who desire to have the articles together in convenient form, or by those who would like to become acquainted with the life and theological contributions of some of the outstanding theological minds of the twentieth century.

Another in Baker's great Limited Editions Library is the reprint of Deissmann's great work, first published in 1908. The present edition is the 1923 translation, however. This is one of the truly important and great works produced on the subject of the language of the New Testament. It was quite revolutionary when it first appeared, with its suggestions that the language of the New Testament was not something esoteric and specially concocted just for the New Testament, but was actually the common and ordinary language of the day. Today we take this as something very commonplace and beyond debate. Nevertheless it is interesting to read of the instances which Deissmann has discovered to corroborate his point.

The book is old and in some ways out of date, but it blazed a great and now universally travelled trail. There is still a storehouse of useful and important material on the language and Sitz im Leben of the New Testament. You will enjoy it.

Dr. Walvoord is president of Dallas Theological Seminary and editor of Bibliotheca Sacra. He has given to us a practical and usable commentary on the most difficult book in the Bible.

As one would expect from Moody Press, the book is strongly premillennialist, and the Lutheran reader will not be particularly pleased with this aspect of the commentary. However, there is a very fine introductory portion in which the author gives several of the current views as to the interpretation of the Book of Revelation. His views on isagogical matters are largely conservative. Very little use is made of the Greek text, and the work will not appeal strongly to pastors who love and use their Greek Testaments. However, the millennialistic element is so strong that we do not predict heavy sales for the volume in Lutheran circles. Used with care, it will have some value for our clergy.

This is a popular and popularly priced fictionalized account of the life of Paul. Written primarily from the standpoint of belief, yet the novel has Paul spending part of his time among the Essenes. In general failed to do much to or for this reviewer. Perhaps there is a place for such books. They remind me of Hollywood religious movies. And they don't do much to or for me either.

We heartily recommend this to our readers as the best treatment of a complicated and often little understood subject that we have encountered. Cardinal Bea deals with the subjects of the Synoptic Problem, Form Criticism, the relation of the divine and the human in the formation of the Scripture, and the attitude of the Roman Church on these subjects, and he does so in a manner which will arouse our admiration both for his limpid thought as well as his solid theological position. He has done a better job in less pages, with less jargon, and more light on the subject than anyone we know. Read, mark, learn, and inwardly digest it. It will solve many problems in our own church.

Taking as the basis for his discussion the "Instruction concerning the historical truth of the Gospels," a document prepared by the Pontifical Biblical Commission in 1964 and printed in L'Osservatore romano for May 14 of that year, Cardinal Bea proceeds to discuss the historicity of the Synoptic Gospels first from the human point of view, and second from the viewpoint of the historical character of these Gospels considered as inspired writings. And he manages to do both very well. He points out that what is lacking in so much of our theologizing today, including that in our own Lutheran church, a clear definition of inspiration and inerrancy. He defines both concepts. He does, what this reviewer has long contended can and should be done, namely, to hold to the fact that the Bible is a human book, written by men in their own setting in time, yet also a divine book, inspired by God and as such without error. Cardinal Bea even allows for the possibility of literary sources for some of the Gospels, but he does not thereby deny their totally divine character and verbal inspiration. He gives an excellent and objective analysis of Form Criticism and its strengths and weaknesses. Read this book. It will help you in an area of a difficult problem.

Baker Book House has been publishing what it calls its Limited Editions Library, a reprint of old and out-of-print classics in various areas of theology. Rackham’s great commentary on Acts is one in this series. First published in 1901, the book is aimed at both clergy and educated laity alike. It will serve both.

Rackham gives the usual introductory material relative to the book. He holds to the Lukan authorship, which in his day was under more attack than at present. He also holds to the unity of the work. He has a valuable section on the theology of Acts, which would add greatly to the resources of those interested in such matters as New Testament Theology. His material on the Church and Ministry is also helpful.

All in all, for those men who do not possess a good, solid commentary on the Book of Acts, here may be what you are looking for. We have seen much poorer works.

The son of Andrew Blackwood, Sr. of Princeton Seminary fame here essays to give a thorough commentary on the book of Ezekiel. His presentation of the content is clear and lucid. The commentary endeavors to make the message of Ezekiel relevant to our times. It is the author’s hope that teachers and students will appreciate the volume as a clear guide to the understanding of one of the more difficult books of the Scriptures.

Blackwood has consulted the standard commentaries on Ezekiel in English and he often utilizes their insights in his verse by verse commentary. He also states that he has found much help from the rabbinic writings of the Mishna and Talmud. The commentaries of Rashi and Kimchi were especially helpful. In his foreward the author acquaints the reader with the difficulties and problems that confront the interpreter and the student of Ezekiel. In opposition to Irwin and Torrey, Blackwood holds that the prophet Ezekiel wrote a report of his visions and dramatic parables. The author believes that an unknown disciple collected Ezekiel’s writings and assembled them into the form now found in the Bible today. He rejects the views of many critics “who envision a long series of editors, most of whom were blundering oafs (p. 15)” He has no sympathy with Dr. Irwin who allows 273 verses to Ezekiel, with Dr. Hijlscher who concedes the prophet 170 verses, and with Dr. Torrey who permits none. For Blackwood the book of Ezekiel is part of the Holy Bible which is the written Word of God.

The author approaches the book not from a viewpoint of “textual, grammatical or historical study, but as the living Word of God, whose thoughts are not always easily understood” (p. 18). In the body of the exposition Blackwood bypasses the critical questions in order to concentrate upon the spiritual, a procedure unusual in commentaries today but which he believes has merit.

Blackwood claims that the book of Ezekiel is difficult, obscure, tantalizing and in places “disgusting,” but nevertheless it contains a message which twentieth century man needs just as much as the Hebrew exiles
He believes that there is no part of the Old Testament that speaks more directly to man's spiritual problems than does the message of Ezekiel. "The central message filling the prophecy is that faith in God, confronting squarely every horror of the present darkness, still looks into the future with hope" (p. 38).

The message of hope is found especially in chapters beginning with 33 through 39, although here and there chapters 1-32 also contain statements of hope. Rightly Blackwood asserts that chapters 33-37 are some of the finest in the book, giving deep theological insights. Chapter 37 with its valley of dry bones is a prophecy of the restoration of Israel to the Promised Land, and does not directly concern the Christian belief in eternal life. The Ideal Shepherd to come in chapter 34:25-31 is the Messiah. The figure of Gog in Chapters 38-39, he interprets "as every force of evil that is marshalled against God." Whether or not Ezekiel had an historical personage in mind, Blackwood believes is immaterial. He does not identify the land of Magog. Chapters 40-48, the blue print for the restored land and Temple, he does not interpret literally as dispensationalists do, but rather as a literal description of a millennium state of affairs.

One of the strong points of the commentary is the employment of the principle that Scripture interprets Scripture. To some readers the parallels drawn between Ezekiel's time and the present will seem far fetched.

While the reviewer does not find himself in agreement with all the interpretations given, he nevertheless is convinced that pastors and students will be helped in their efforts to comprehend the message of one of the strangest figures of Old Testament prophecy. Ezekiel does have a message of hope for these dark and critical days of our time.

The publishers of this volume claim that it is the first dictionary of Biblical archaeology made available to Bible students. More than forty scholars have contributed articles to this readable, informative and educational volume. It presents the findings of Biblical archaeology to the reader in convenient and usable form.

In The Biblical World archaeology of both the Old and the New Testament is covered. There are comprehensive articles on archaeology, the major archaeologists, and the organizations supporting archaeological endeavors (e.g., Albright, Kenyon, Glueck, American Schools of Oriental Research and Ecole Biblique). The reader will find articles on the major texts and literature unexposed by the archaeologist's spade (e.g., The Baal Epic, Book of the Dead, Descent of Ishtar, Gilgamesh Epic). There are articles on ancient cities and excavated sites (e.g., Jericho, Ai, Capernaum, Damascus, Ur and Babylon). The life and customs of Biblical Times are also discussed (e.g., Agriculture, Architecture, Funerary Customs and Marriage). Information on historical characters of Bible times as revealed by archaeology are likewise presented (e.g., Abraham, Isaac, Nebuchadnezzar and Xerxes). Numerous and appropriate photographs and illustrations illuminate the text.

The editor and many of the contributors defend the authority and inspiration of the Bible. The relationship of archaeology to the Bible is stated as follows: "The volume of evidence that has become available has led to a new approach to the historical value of Biblical records. Naturally, archaeological support is not available for every Biblical event. Yet it is true to say that archaeology has corroborated the substantial historicity of the Biblical record from the patriarchal age to the apostolic age. Despite this, however, exaggerated claims should not be made for the achievements of archaeology" (pp. 65-66).

On pages 67-68, "Archaeologists and Their Work," the dictionary gives an excellent historical overview of the names of archaeologists, the sites excavated by them, and the principal activities and discoveries at such excavations. Major articles in The Biblical World are usually concluded with a bibliography which those who desire further to pursue a given subject will find helpful.

Dr. Fiebrich, general editor and author of many other books, is a well known conservative scholar who gives evidence in this volume of a thorough acquaintance with the field of archaeology. He had the assistance and expert counsel of three outstanding scholars: E. Leslie Carson of Southwestern Baptist Theological Seminary; J. A. Thompson, a recognized archaeologist, author and lecturer in Old Testament studies at Baptist Theological College of New South Wales, Australia; and Claude F. A. Schaeffer, the famous archaeologist who served as Director of the French Archaeological Expedition to Aegean.

Those who use The Biblical World will find it to be a valuable reference volume replete with archaeological, geographical and historical information. No serious student of Biblical archaeology can afford to be without this book. It should be an indispensable adjunct to any congregational library.

Raymond F. Fiebrich

This commentary is the first of three projected volumes on Isaiah by the well known conservative professor of Old Testament at Westminster Seminary, Philadelphia, Pa. It also constitutes the first volume of the projected commentary series to be known as The New International Commentary on the Old Testament, of which Dr. Young is the general editor.

The author states that he has written "for the needs of the minister and Sunday-School teacher," Hebrew words in the text are few, and technical allusions are restricted to footnotes; special notes and append-ins. According to the publishers, "The New International Commentary on the Old Testament" is not a mere repetition of a tradition. The book is recognized as being the Word of God, and that Word is given the right of way at all times. With the help of this faith, and the disciplines and discoveries of modern scholarship, the aim of this commentary is to lay bare the meaning of God's Word."

In his method, Dr. Young is traditional in that he proceeds to comment verse by verse (or phrase by phrase) on his own literal translation. It is a reverent exposition in the finest sense of Old Reformed tradition. He cites from the older often neglected commentaries of Calvin, Deissler, Delitzsch and Meyendorf. He accepts without cavil the infallibility of God's Word and regards Isaiah as the author of the entire prophecy and its contents as truth revealed from God to the prophet. The author's main concern is to establish what the book teaches in its doctrinal sense. Modern critical scholarship will no doubt mark Dr. Young for not devoting more space to historical, sociological and literary questions. The outcome of the exegetical work is that of classical orthodoxy.

Isaiah 7:14; 8:3-4; 7:14; 7:2-7 and 7:16 are interpreted as "messianic." The stroke of 7:14 is considered a direct prophecy of the Savior's birth of the Virgin Mary. Dr. Young writes: "Isaiah, therefore, is not announcing some contemporary birth, neither that of Hezekiah, nor of any unknown, obscure child. Rather, in dim and strange vision he looks forward to the birth of One whose very presence brings God to His people" (p. 281).

The doctrine of the vicarious atonement is upheld in his remarks on Isaiah 12:1 (p. 452). In opposition to those who are emphasizing the acts of God at the expense of a written revelation, Dr. Young's words are worth noting: "But it is not possible to tell of the mighty deeds of God without also giving an interpretation of these deeds. We must tell who that Jesus is and what He has accomplished by His death. And when we do that, we are preaching doctrine. Doctrine then must be the content of what we preach to the hearers" (p. 406). The author is a consistent Calvinist who teaches a predestination to damnation (p. 281), an interpretation Lutherans hold to be unacceptable.

Undoubtedly Dr. Young's hermeneutics will be faulted by those who have accepted the methodology of Gattungsforschung and Veroffentlichungs geschichte, twentieth century developments in hermeneutics. The use of the vie pattern as a dramatic motif is seriously questioned by the author. The idea that Israel observed an enthronement festival for Yahweh is rejected in an appendix.

If the remaining volumes of The New International Commentary on the Old Testament will be as scholarly and as faithful to God's written revelation as Dr. Young's is, conservatives will have reason to rejoice.

Raymond F. Scharper

This is to date the eighth and the latest in The Christian Encounter series. It faces the problems that grew out of current "Volkswanderung."
from the farm into urban areas; perhaps into "strip city" areas such as that stretching in one continuous urban area from Boston to Washington, or from Green Bay to Gary, or from San Francisco to San Diego. It is predicted that before long 7% of the total population will, with the help of machines, technological innovations, giant corporations, food, clothes and run our society (p. 9). In an accelerating pace our culture is moving toward mechanization, automation, suburbanization.

This tremendous shift in centers of population brings with it problems of segregation and integration, racial and economic problems, housing and open occupancy, employment, education, traffic, air and water pollution, slums, and urban renewal. Slum areas often develop, where rates are reported to have chewed off the ears of little children, "Shnips stand as a monument to a greater love of property (and profits) than persons" (p. 89). Christian citizens have a "distinctly Christian contribution to make toward our emerging urban culture" (p. 84). Pastors need not become experts in areas other than theology and counseling. But they must be informed in other areas of living, such as economics, government, politics. Christians "must be concerned with all of God's creation (p. 84) with all areas of life. This is no doubt what was meant by the Detroit Resolution on "The Church in Christ's Mission, to the whole man, to the whole society."

Arthur Schuyl is very impatient with complacent spectators of the battle that is going on. The Church must not be kept from action by critics within the Church who cry: "Stick to your texts! Preach the Gospel! Save souls! In the war on poverty and in the open occupancy struggle the Church has erred on the side of too much caution and too little action . . . Institutions, like people, can lose their sense while bent on preserving them" (p. 78). "Conformity with yesterday's pattern in today's urban world produces schizophrenic lives and curials witnessing" (p. 77).

What can Christians, and Lutheran congregations, do that they have not already tried to do? Is there a uniquely Christian response to programs of urban renewal? Protestant Christians can cooperate with Catholic disciples of Jesus with Jews and with Unitarians in seeking the peace of the city and maintaining civil righteousness in the community. At the same time each segment of religious society can contribute that which it is uniquely qualified to contribute.

Each Christian, according to his native ability and his training, can contribute something to the improvement of community life, whether that be in matters of racial integration, open occupancy housing, equal opportunity in education and in employment, traffic, air and water pollution problems. In short, making the city a better place in which to live. Responsibility for having blindly defended the status quo, feeling ashamed for aloofness in the past, re-acceptance and re-commitment to Christ. This is the first step.

That would also presuppose a more highly trained ministry, with ongoing post-graduate work in theology, sociology, philosophy and the art of good government. But that will have to wait for the author's next book.

Does the pastor and his parish have a contribution to make toward emerging new concepts in economics? By this time each pastor owns and has read at least one or two of the Christian Encounter series of eight paperback volumes printed by our Concordia Publishing House, edited from the viewpoints of Biblical theology, and uniformly designed to make both our clergy and our laity literate in hitherto relatively uninvaded areas of living. The author has in his study on the assumption that "the Christian has been called to heal the breaches and bind up the wounds of a creation that is good, but not yet what it can become" (p. 110).

The frequency of terms like "capitalism," "socialism," "communism," "improvement of living conditions in retarded countries," "revolutions in hitherto underdeveloped countries," "labor and management struggles," "civil rights and the Great Society," all of these indicate that all humanity is in a state of fermentation. Because the churches have been past frequently allied themselves with the "haves" against the "have-nots" the message of the church has become suspect, churches have been closed, turned into museums, missions to foreign lands have been curtailed, if not forbidden. Churches have in many cases realized that they have too late informed themselves about the meaning of class struggles that have been unsettling the peace of the world. This volume by author Heyne is timely reading for laity and pastors in all churches.

"Christianity has had very little to say about the economic order," declares author Heyne. Economically speaking, no one can live unto himself. One is dependent on the other. Back gets in "the open market" what he needs and can afford. The effect of mechanization is dramatically illustrated in the fact that 70% of the inhabitants of India are engaged in agriculture and still famine exists, while in America about 7% of the working population is similarly engaged and we have surplus problems. Do Christian ethics say anything about surpluses here and starvation there?

The pros and cons of free enterprise, the capitalism versus the socialist system, are hotly debated and often lead to international tensions and open warfare. Under Marxism, theoretically, there is no free enterprise and no private property, no room for monopolies except those engineered by the State. Is the competitive market and are monopolies good or bad? This brings the author to aspects of economics which are of special concern to Christians, and still more directly to the Shepherd of the flock, the pastor. Is he going to take sides? With whom will he take sides before an election, the party that moves in the direction of socialism, or that which clings sensationally to the status quo and the capitalist system? Shall the Christian put his shoulder to the wheel in behalf of the Good Society, or as it is now called, the Great Society? Many Christians fervently for having either called themselves with the few privileged ones or at least have stood idly on the sidelines of the battle at the margins against the chances.

Is our economic system just? Is it fair? Author Heyne reminds us that big fortunes are not always spent in rigorous living. Surplus capital has largely been used for expansion of the economy, creating more jobs, and also for philanthropic purposes. The purpose of a planned economy should be better understood in the battle for free enterprise and for elimination of poverty the basic problem of human nature is often overlooked. This mistake by Marx may yet prove the undoing of the Marxist system.

Love is the overcoming of separation among men, just as the love of God is the overcoming in Jesus Christ of the gulf of separation between God and man.

Henry P. Boettcher

After all, there are a great number of books written these days treating the same topic as this book, published by the Moody Press. Yet this book condemns itself to us for its concise and simple treatment of the problems that trouble some people who want to be Bible Christians. The treatment is so simple that naturally it would not satisfy some of the people moving in the rarefied atmosphere of the "theology" of scholars, and students involved in studying the problems of the "Postconciliar influences on the tendencies of the infrastructure of the Latin mission methods," or other topics chosen for a dissertation that must not treat something discussed in the universities for the last 3,000 years.

Brother, you can give this book to any literate man who has heard a bell ring somewhere and you will not insult his intelligence but probably will help him realize what the Bible is about. That does not eliminate the coming in the title because it does not speak of Bible science.

It is refreshing to see that the author, or authors, start out with the Witness of the Spirit when discussing inspiration. They correctly speak of the witness, internal, that testifies to Jesus Christ. The torquentium spectre sanat interfusion, as it correctly claimed, extends not only to the fact that we are the children of God but embraces all of the Word of God by which the Spirit works faith.

The chapter headings show us what problems the authors attempt to tackle in this small volume. The virtue of such a condensed and simplified presentation is that it avoids disputes and arguments in favor of wisdom. There are chapters on: The Bible and Origins, Evidence for Creation, The Creation of Man, etc.

Give the book to your members, to high school students, university students, and let it do its work by its Biblical testimony.

REFORMED DOGMATICS: J. Wolfius, G. Vossius, F. Turretin. John
W. Beardsea, editor and translator. Oxford University Press,

This volume is part of A Library of Protestant Thought. The theological world owes a debt of gratitude to the editor and publisher, for here is material that is not readily available to the theologian. The book includes in whole or in part works of three Reformed theologians of the 17th century. The first is a complete Reformed dogmatics by Johannes Wolfius, (1556-1638) a Dutch theologian whose works were translated into Dutch and English and widely used during his lifetime and after his death. It is a typical Reformed dogmatics, featuring the doctrine of predestination prominently, and subordinating the remainder of theology generally to this doctrine.

The writing is very clear, the definitions are very precise, as were also the definitions of Lutheran dogmatics of the same period. This work covers pages 25-267.

The second work is by Guilt Vossius and is entitled: Concerning Practical Theology.

Practical Theology appears to be understood in part as ethics, and in part as what would today be called Pastoral Theology. Vossius (1568-1676) lived through the period of the Synod of Dort, and the struggle with the so-called Remonstrants or Arminians. His arguments are a defense of the Calvinistic position and the Calvinistic concern with moral and pastoral care. One can gain an insight in this work of Vossius into the practical concerns that moved men's hearts in the bitter struggle between orthodox Calvinists and Remonstrants.

The third work featured in our volume is the Institutio Theologica Exegetica by Francis Turretin (1528-1687). Our book features Locus IV. Concerning the Doctrines of God in General, and Predestination in Particular.

Turretin is known as a strict Calvinist, and the position here taken is that of historic Calvinism as maintained and defended at the Synod of Dort against the Remonstrants.

As primary works of Calvinistic theology from the 17th century these writings are most valuable for the student of theology in our time.
The book is hereby highly recommended.

Fred Kramer
SITTING ETHICS. By Joseph Fletcher. Westminster Press, Phila

IMPORTANT MORAL ISSUES. A. W. Hastings and K. Hastings (eds.)

ETHICS AND THE HUMAN COMMUNITY. By Melvin Rader. Holt,

Joseph Fletcher's book makes interesting, entertaining and fascinating reading even if you are not particularly concerned with the problem of contemporary ethics. It has many references, stories, cases, and a generous portion of humor. Fletcher warns "situation ethics" to be considered Christian ethics, naturally, we could say, because none of the religions men, not even the God-dead men, want to relinquish the term Christian. Why they still consider the same honorable after all that has been said of ancient, middle age, or new Christianity is a mystery.

Fletcher is honest. He does not want to solve the manifold casuistic problems of which he knows many. For him LOVE is the great thing, and as such, love (of course he knows the semantic confusion of this "swampy" term) seems to justify everything, not excepting murder.

The reader must be grateful to the author for the presentation of this concept of situation ethics for much of it tears away at the self-righteousness of "good" people, but the Lutheran reader will notice that there is nothing to replace the lost righteousness. There is no forgiveness of sins, for if situation ethics is taken seriously it must condemn; unbelievable anyone who has acted without considering and balancing the four factors at stake in every situation: the end, the means, the motive, the consequences (p. 127 f.). "The end is the primary one. "Only the end justifies the means, nothing else" is one of the main prepositions.
This is a conclusion to which any man must come who does not believe in the laws of God. And since Fletcher, once Bishop of St. Paul's of Cincinnati, is the logical partner to Bishop "Honest to God" Robinson, we cannot and will not debate with him. We must know, however, that the created orders of God have at all times, and even today given an answer to what is right and what is wrong. The Christian knows that Life is more than biological existence, that fallen man can never be justified in his works no matter how strict a code he follows, and that the Christian can decide matters of life and death only in total surrender to God and also then only with a "Kyrie eleison" in his heart. Many questions of casuistry are asked by wounded conscience and the cry even in not the cry: "Forgive!" but "Kyrie, justif..." The trouble is that men like Fletcher present their approach as one of three possible: the pessimistic, the anthropocentric, the situationalist. Any one of these approaches, if taken seriously by all, would make this world a much better place in which to live. The trouble is that having no morals or ethics, or conscience, or what is the same, having no respect for God and His will, man sinks deeper into the depravity that is his by birth.
And to say this is to risk the ridicule of all "progressive" thinkers.

Important Moral Issues is the book form of a series of articles pub-Fished in The Expository Times, 1933-34. Two essays form the pro-legomena.

The first, by Professor J. F. D. Molyneaux, D.D., of Cambridge, con-cides with a sentence which sounds very familiar in our day: "What is written is an indispensable aid to seeking God; but it is not in the inevitable writings, but in the living encounter—identity shared with others and checked in mutual debate—that the divine guidance is to be sought" (p.
17). To a reader alert to the lack of proper distinction between Law and Gospel the concluding sentence of the author who seems to have no clear concept of the Gospel, comes as a surprise: "This short article is only a warning against the constant danger of confusing law and gospel or trying to legalize the gospel."

The second essay by the Reverend Cyril S. North, M.A., Birmingham, is much more systematic. He too sees no real basis for Christian ethics, i.e., no code or set of rules. He sees no way to bridge the gap between Christ's teachings and the present day. He notes five difficulties: 1) the problem of the authenticity of the sayings of Jesus. . . \(\ldots\), "The recent studies of the Gospels and Form Criticism in particular make it no longer possibile to rely upon a categorical 'Jesus said'; 2) the teaching of Jesus is ambiguous; 3) the New Testament is a book of religion, not a manual of ethics; 4) the ethical teaching of the New Testament is chiefly personal ethics; 5) the background situation of the New Testament is quite different from ours.

To this comes the fact that the Social Sciences raise a threat to religion. Modern knowledge and Sociology have modified many attitudes and have made Christians uncertain as to the basis of their ethical judgments. By far the best statement of the author is: "The ethic of Jesus is the impossible ethic of being perfect as our heavenly Father is perfect. Our conscience assesses this as the only possible ethic. . . .
This is why Christians must always be confessing their sins and seeking forgivenness and the Power of the Spirit." A statement, by the way, truly Trinitarian. Not alone in his query: "Is there not a need to recover that which was expressed in the idea of natural law?" We would say yes and amen, but would like to have "natural law" defined as God's created orders.

It is just this neglect of God's natural order in favor of utilitarian or pragmatic approaches to situations which makes most discussions on ethical problems so difficult and frustrating. Take as example the fairly good essay on gambling (p. 68 f.) by the Reverend Edward Rogers of London. He gives good reasons for considering gambling a social action (one cannot mentally gamble with himself) to be judged by the chance expressed in the act, the principle involved in the act, the consequences resulting from the act. He comes out clearly to state "that the central conviction must be that the Christian obligation to love one's neighbor as oneself rules out a readiness to gain at another's inevitable loss, even if he is a willing partner" (p. 70). Hardy anywhere however, do we find the concept of stewardship tied up with love for the neighbor. According to God's order of creation He has given me responsibility for what I have out of God's hands as well as for the brother whom God has placed before use as His, God's 'mask'; as Father put it. Christians who are men who have been restored in Christ to God's image see in all they have God's property and do not gamble with it, nor do they laughingly pocket the loser's goods. But where utilitarian motives (mostly selfish motives, the few examples of heroic sacrience, cannot outweigh the universal question "Am I my brothers' keeper?" put sometimes blindly (more sometimes by inatible resolution of the heart), where utilitarian motives decide right and wrong, and surely most of us are not properly balanced in our minds to make such decisions when the situation we face is not the ego rise up in panic self-defense. Besides, we all know that the post factum (post mortem?) arguments usually are so rationalizing as to be irrational. With Cain it was a post mortem ghastly con: Should I ride herd on the herdman?

In the volume of 488 pages by Melvin Rader, Professor of Philosophy at the University of Washington, we have an excellent textbook on philosophical and social ethics, and of course the author does not neglect religious ethics. His picture on the jacket flap shows the ideal professor: humane, kind and wise, and with just the right portion of humor. We did not read the entire book (but we will). Dr. Rader is a friend to the reader who cannot wait to read the whole book to see "how it all turns out." He tells all in his conclusion. One of the last sentences in the first and centers of his book, at the same time justifying the title, Ethics and the Human Community. He says in the last paragraph: "Despite the tragedy and confusion, the hope of the great community gives a majestic significance and purposefulness of our age. Those of us who love adventure and desire a better world are not sick before the prospect that looms ahead. If we keep bright the arrows of desire—of love and not limitations, of love and not death—we may eventually storm and occupy the citadel of power."

Let the world cheer as it bears these courageous words... but let us reap for this world and for the hopes of such futurity. We know "the Great Community" is in the world, not seen as such, because it is not of the world. The great hope is love and not death, because it is the Love of the Lord of Life and Death, who dies and rose again that we might live, with Him and in Him even here and now. The arrows of which our quiver ought to be full are the power of the Word, the citadel of power that even the portals of hell will not consume are the gates of the Church.

There are four parts to this book: Part One: Fact and Value, Part Two: Right and Obligation, Part Three: Skeptic's Theories, Part Four: Social Ideals.

M. J. Neuman

The subtitle of this book indicates that it was the author's intention to present some "Studies in Philosophic Anthropology." The text of the book indicates that it was the author's purpose to map out the philosophic None by which man has come to the "critical situation" of our time—mostly, that being conceived and treated as an animal, man lives like an, and attempts to dignify the whole meaningless business by calling it "modern living."

Perhaps a paragraph (from page 114) will make it clear exactly what the author considers man's present predicament to be, and will at the same time permit him to tell us in his own words what factors produce this predicament:

At the bottom of this critical situation we may discover the cause responsible for it as the crisis in human values. As we pointed out in the first chapter.
human values have been devalued, dilated, transvalua-ted, depreciated, and transformed in two ways: first, their original, authentic, and intrinsic meaning has been destroyed by pseudo-philosophies such as materialism, positivism, naturalism, and pragmatism; second, the unified system and hierarchy of values has been equally dissociated by the theories of relativism and subjectivity of values, leading to the attitude of false individualism.
Correspondingly, human existence has lost its meaning, significance, and goal-directed transcendence, decaying into the abyss of materialism, scepticism, and collectivism. Man as an individual human being, as a person, has lost his relative subsistence and absolutes. The uprooting of values led to the devolution of man himself.

It is quite evident from this paragraph that this book is characterized by sound insight. In its main thesis, as well as in specifics, it presents a fair and dependable account of developments in Western thought which are to blame for the "loneliness" and "samoan" of men in this "age of loneliness."

An example of the book's insight in dealing with specifics is found for instance, in the way it points Decons' contribution to the loss of value and meaning by showing how his liberation of reality into mind and matter encouraged an overriding preoccupation with that aspect of reality which is amenable to measurement, and tended to isolate the realm of mind to a place of insignificance, with the result that man's attention came to be focused more and more exclusively on the "re externe."

Lutherans, however, will find it very difficult to agree with this statement:

The disintegration of the original unity and harmony established by the transcendent scale of values was brought daylight by M. Luther's rejection of reason illuminated by faith. The classical formulae: "intellectus ad credendum" and "credo ad intellectum" lost their meaning in the Lutheran interpretation of faith deprived of a critical-reflective foundation. The separation of reason and faith leads to the separation of the natural from the supernatural order. The latter was justified now by mere blind faith which necessarily invited reason to challenge its legitimacy. Furthermore, the individualistic and subjective tendencies, incarnated by an inadequate interpretation of personal freedom confined with authority, paved the road to either rationalistic or pietistic interprecipitations of religious doctrines, leading to the fragmentation of religious communities so well illustrated by the increasing number of new church organizations (page 18).

Luther's warfare was against the unregenerate reason which leads men to trust in their own good works for salvation—that perniciously false notion which our Confessions call the "spurious legis."

Even though a Lutheran will put a question mark in the margin where the above paragraph appears, this book is a valuable discussion of the philosophical process which ended with the "dropping of the object" (as C.E.M. Joad puts it) and with the demise of meaning in our confused world.

In the author's own words this is "an essay in clarification" and "an essay into anti-supernaturalism." But his modern appraisal and the inexpensive makeup of this paperback should not deceive. Here is a formidable, readable, and informative critique of current trends in theology which, on the pretext of searching for meaningfulness in religion, have stripped Christianity not only of its garb but its skin as well.

The big question for "respectable" theology in a scientific age is: "How far the Christian Gospel can be considered credible and relevant to enlightened men today?" (p. 13). Hamilton traces the course of modern liberalism and shows that under especially Buttmann's dispensationalism (along with Tillich, Ogden, Van Patten, Bishop Robinson, et al.) it has come full turn to the Schleiermacher-Kantscharrack whirlpool where it all started in the first place before Barth, Brueger, and company (and before them already, Denney and Forsyth), temporarily interrupted the theological drift with at least a partial turn windward towards Biblical kind of theology.

In his second part Hamilton deals with the philosophical presuppositions that underlie much of what passed for theologizing in the past. Having demonstrated that Thomism "carries on the Greek view of an available God established by an indubitable metaphysics," (p. 63) Hamilton goes on to an especially strong chapter on Schleiermacher, as father of modern Protestant theology, explicating not merely his method but demonstrating also that his thinking is basically similar to much of Greek natural theology, the net result being that Schleiermacher's "God" have left the world an inheritance that "deserts the Christ of History for the Christ of Faith" (a more symbolic figure of their own creation), all the while unbothered by the incongruity of the cold facts that their "picture of Jesus as the Christ is hard to reconcile with either the New Testament witness to the Lord Jesus Christ or the traditional creeds of Christendom" (p. 106).

In Bulfinch'sAmong the Prophets, in a situation that has bothered "Israel" in our times, Hamilton answers with a flat, well-examined
Yes! That is, among the prophets of Schleiermacher. "However distant in other respects they may be, Schleiermacher and the theologians share a structurally identical conception of faith," (p. 113) contends Hamilton, and at root this involves a "revolt against heaven," against every vestige of the supernatural, against God Himself.

In his third part Hamilton treats of the moral-pragmatic approaches to theology and their "earth-bound God," and carefully arrives at a similar conclusion, viz., that this "approach to religious faith shows itself to be an anti-supernaturalistic world-view which assumes an immanent, earth-bound God but does not want to admit that it has metaphysical presuppositions" (p. 164).

Hamilton’s “see-in-the-hole,” as it were, is Bonhoeffer whom he claims for his side as proving “that not every ‘revolutionary’ theology in the twentieth century is anti-supernaturalistic” (p. 163). It may be hard to dispute his favorable judgment upon one who had gained an almost sacramental sickle in people’s minds through his heroic martyrdom, but the disturbing fact remains that some of the most outspoken foes of supernatural elements in Christian belief have also claimed Bonhoeffer as their inspiration—perhaps mistakenly, but nevertheless true. The same disturbing fact holds for Barth and his tendency to overemphasize “signs” over “historical fact” in Biblical interpretation. Either these men, Barth and Bonhoeffer, have not been clear, or those reading and using them are not. And there is reason to argue that both are true, and that we have two sides of the same coin, with the image on both sides still Schleiermacher’s!

Aside from this criticism, however, Hamilton’s book is worth anyone’s time if he has concern for the church’s theology in our time. He has his finger on liberalism’s problem in any and every day of this world’s history, whether Noah, Isaiah, Paul, Luther, ours: Can we still believe in miracles, in the supernatural, in God, judged as we are on every side, by too natural a realm and many contend over it? When the only problem for our naturalistic age, which feels that science has unlocked all other looms, seems to be with UFOs in some Michigan swamp?

Hamilton has not left the God-is-Dead Movement! Kenneth Hamilton, who teaches systematic theology at United College, Winnipeg, may live in a cold clime but he has a warm heart for the Gospel and has succeeded, with amazing dispatch, to present a solid, though brief (perhaps that is all it deserves!), challenge to the likes of Althusser, Van Jamra, Zinaman, Cox, and Williams (apparently no relation) Hamilton. Though, he apologizes for what he calls an “interim report,” Hamilton lets the charge fall in an and hard that these divine-dead-enders “have singularly failed to publish a coherent manifesto,” (p. 12) when they advise Christians that they now "may stop both speaking about and believing in God, while continuing to take Jesus Christ as the focal point of their faith" (p. 17).

It used to be that people wrote books when they thought that they had something clearly in mind which they wanted to put down on paper, but that day apparently is past. Witness Allister’s almost pathetic confession as he writes to Hamilton and expresses surprise that he (Hamilton) found a unity in his Allister’s thought, stating further “that you led me to understand something about that unity which I had not yet been able to grasp’’ (Quoted in Edmunds 1946-47 fall and winter Catalog).

All of which reminds me of a pertinent incident that happened in our home, with our six year old, in connection with Hamilton’s critique. The paperback has a cover in vivid colors and with letters in large print, GOD IS DEAD, enough to attract any second grader for whom the wonderful world of reading has just opened up. “God is dead??” he asked to his six year old playmate, when he saw the book on my desk, and within earshot of his mother. “That’s not so, because I know.” (Here the Johnstone report would have to come in for critical reappraisal, for Springfield’s Trinity parochial school and Sunday School are apparently getting through!) “It would have been all right for them to write that book when He was dead but not now. Now they ought to make them burn these books up!”—So much for the judgment at the six year old, but to mind come the words of Jesus which He quoted from the psalms, “Out of the mouths of babes, etc.” (Matt. 21, 16), the words, too, of the apostle Paul in I Corinthians 15, 53-56, and the book-burning was one of Martin Luther. Stated it to say that Hamilton’s book may save the trouble, not only of book-burning but of looking into the significant book that caused all the stir; for he gives a review and critique in his fourth chapter of Vahanian’s The Death of God: The Culture of our Post-Christian Era, Hamilton’s The New Essence of Christianity, Allister’s Radical Theology and the Death of God and The Gospel of Christian Ethics, Van Buren’s Secular Meaning of the Gospel and Cox’s Secular City.

How do you explain the God-is-dead people? Are they satisfying “a psychological need?” Something like the student protests, marches, etc.? Trying to “offset orthodox Protestantism?” To make “the new radical feel that he is part and parcel of the modern American scene?” All these ingredients are no doubt present, but primarily. Hamilton argues, they are trying “to engage the Christian life to the fullest extent possible with envirorong secular world” (p. 14-21 passage). And so, who isn’t, if his theology is at all Christian and relevant? But “engage” is one thing; conform, or identity with, is another?

Hamilton traces the “pedigree of a slogan” in his second and third chapters, during a good job of showing the difficulties that the Christian church has always had in keeping its organizational feet out of its witnessing mouth, meanwhile often leaving itself wide open for head-on blows from Christianity’s learned detractors, including the God-is-dead crew who now shout back even at their former mentors: “Babylonism (and we might add, Babylomansia and Tithelismansia are out!”

When tc. once you have decided that the Gospel must be judged by

With her personal missionary experience in eastern Venezuela and the help of other missionary wives, Mrs. Tugby has provided the badly needed counterparts to materials that have been written concerning the missionary husband and his work. Thoroughness and a warm Christian approach are hallmarks of her treatise. Yet, it is not emotionally idealistic. Its true-to-life practical approach elevates her book to a handbook. Its real qualities stand out in Mrs. Tugby's handling of the problem that each missionary wife has to face, i.e., how to fulfill her responsibility to God both as a missionary and as a wife and mother. In James G. Frazer's letter quoted in part on page 118, so we get the correct impression that prayer has become to him a means of grace? It is hard to tell whether Mrs. Tugby views it thus. She comes close to it in her discussion on pages 32-34. However, she does an admirable job of pointing up the great importance of prayer, which we are so prone to neglect. An index would enhance the book's usefulness to wives who own the book and to those who wish to use it for teaching purposes. Any Christian wife, and especially pastors' wives, would also benefit greatly from reading this book. Need we mention the missionary wife?

The Song of Solomon is commonly misunderstood as an exaltation of conjugal love. In this volume, Peter C. Krey, a 1959 graduate of Concordia Seminary, Springfield, views the Song of Solomon as what it is, a poem of Christ's love for His Church and the Church's response of devotion to Him. The author is convinced that "this poem portrays the highest ideals of conjugal love as a counterpart of a far deeper and greater love, the love of Christ for His Church and the Church's love for Him" (pp. 1-2). This conviction undergirds all that the author says and results in interpretation that is consistent and clear. In a series of fifty meditations, Pastor Krey with reverent insight and often beautiful language explains this magnificent love poem. The reader of this book... will gain a new appreciation of the Song of Solomon. These devotions will inform and inspire. They can well be used as a guide for daily meditation or for more intensive Bible study.

The author is currently Distinguished Professor of Pastoral Care at Bryn Mawr School, Texas Christian University. It is his conviction that the two most important functions of the minister, preaching and pastoral work are not in conflict but strengthen and reinforce each other. He points out that most of the great preachers have also been faithful pastors.

In the first section of the book Kemp emphasizes the necessity of speaking to people's needs, of meeting these needs in individual lives, and of preaching that results in Christian growth. In Part II of the book, sermons are presented which stress specific kinds of growth such as from doubt to faith from guilt to forgiveness, from restlessness to peace, from hostility to love, from pride to humility. The sermons, being both contemporary and from about a generation ago, provide a historical perspective from which one can see how preachers have endeavored to guide and inspire people to higher Christian living.

The principles the author dramatizes in the first part of the book need to be understood by every preacher-pastor. The way in which these principles are carried out in some of the sermons in the second part of the book leaves something to be desired. The insights into the human condition are excellent, but God's own remedy, the Gospel of the cross, is often applied only vaguely or is not even offered as a remedy. The sermons can be read with profit because they speak penetratively to men's needs. They can be helpful to the preacher who also knows how to lead his hearers in the cross and how to speak meaningfully of the love of God in Christ.

HAPPINESS IS FINDING THE LOVE AND WILL OF GOD. By Arthur E. Graf. The Board of Stewardship of the Northern Illinois District of the Lutheran Church-Missouri Synod, Chicago, 1966. 60c.

In this little booklet Professor Graf has provided five studies in Christian stewardship for young people of high school age. His aim is to "help them understand better the purpose and function in life." The five lessons are entitled: "God Has Made Me," "Redeemed for a Purpose," "Empowered by the Holy Spirit," "Living Successfully," "Even So Send I You." Each lesson includes a development of the topic, questions for home study, additional questions for discussion, and suggested memory verses.

That a district stewardship board would display its concern for the stewardship life of Christian youth by commissioning and publishing these Bible studies is commendable. We have felt that much of our stewardship teaching comes too late. We are often frustrated in influencing church members because they have already bound themselves in with a worthy "style of life" before we seriously present the demands of discipleship.

Professor Graf writes with clarity and practicality. He reveals his understanding of Christian youth. Furthermore, there are truly Biblical studies in the sense that the student is directed to dozens of Scripture passages for home study.

The value of the author's work will depend largely upon the skill of the teacher. One has the feeling that if copies of this book were placed into the hands of the students, the students would find the discussion questions and topics articulate. The author has done such a good job of expounding the lesson that there is little for the learner to discover.

In teaching Christian stewardship, one is seeking to change attitudes and produce action patterns. This kind of learning demands that the learner become engaged in the struggle to develop and change his self concept. A heuristic approach is essential if the learner is to become personally involved. By doing the work for him, or by making the study questions merely a retelling of what has already been, beautifully said, we deprive the learner of the process by which change comes. The material of these studies is excellent. A discerning teacher's methodology would be required to make the lessons live.

This is a book of short, encyclopedic paragraphs and small, stylized illustrations. The book is divided into three parts: one deals with facts about the Bible, a second gives a brief outline of church history in topical form, and a third presents facts about Christian hymns.

We do not recommend this book for the professional library. There are many more profitable ways to spend six dollars. The articles are extremely brief. In almost every case, a pastor would have to search elsewhere for detailed information.

However, we do recommend this book for inclusion in church libraries. It would also be a fine gift for a Sunday school teacher. It is the kind of book in which one may page around to find bits and pieces of interesting information. The Sunday school teacher would find it useful and helpful in preparing lessons. The inclusiveness of the book is indicated by the fact that it reveals the name of the fifth reindeer in the Santa Claus' team (Comet) as well as partial biographies of Christian leaders, backgrounds of hymns, and definitions of Biblical place names, objects and groups.

Is a shared-time program of education, students enrolled in church-related elementary or secondary schools take some courses in their own schools and other courses in public schools. Such programs have been in existence in various localities for many years. They have represented, almost entirely, efforts for rapprochement between Roman Catholic and public schools.

The Elementary and Secondary Education Act of 1965 has brought the problem of federal and state aid to nonpublic school students into sharper focus. Crucial issues are at stake. They will be settled in the next decade or two on the basis of debate, experimentation and court action.

Mrs. Friedlander's thesis is that Christian citizens and churches should understand the issues so that they may participate in the process of decision. Her book is not the final word about "Shared Time." It is, rather, a primer which will provide definitions and locate the issues. The author predicts that compromises in the church-state education problem are inevitable. Writing with the clarity of a journalist, and assisted by the legal advice of her attorney husband, Mrs. Friedlander has produced a readable, scholarly and helpful book.

Is a nonpublic school pupil entitled to some services from the public school? Is it possible for church schools to provide public schools to teach the "non-value" subjects? What is a "non-value" subject? Can nonpublic and public schools work together without violating the constitution? These and many other thorny questions are brought to view in this book. The author does not pontificate. She reports what others are saying. She brings the issues into focus. She provides reliable data.

We strongly recommend this book for what it purports to be—an orientation for thinking about one of the most vexing and pressing problems of our day.

The noted Chicago missiologist has offered rare and excellent material in this book as the subtitles indicate: the early missionary ordination sermons, charges, and instructions, a source book on the rise of American missions in the beginning. The foreword and introduction, totalling thirty-two pages, give an excellent overview of the missionary efforts directed toward the American Indians in the eighteenth century. This chapter needed to be written, the more since the role of the white man toward the Indian is thought to be entirely black. Much more is needed, however, to demonstrate the repeated though disappointing efforts of many religious groups.

Pioneers in Mission is a particularly heartening book in our day. The priority of the Gospel is strongly throughout from the sermon of Joseph Bissell in Boston, December 12, 1743, at the ordination of Stephen Parker, Ebenezer Hindell, and Joseph Slocum to the ministry at the ordination of Massas, Hall, Judson, Newell, Nott, and Rice (and farewell to the wives) on February 5-6, 1812. These were the first overseas missionaries from America.

A footnote, page 57, shows that the Royal Charter was aware of a Christian obligation toward the Indians: "Go as their good Life and orderly Conversation may win the Indians, Native of the Country, to the Knowledge and Obeyance of the true God and Saviour of mankind."

It becomes apparent that the understanding of the missionary endeavor was not so backward as it sometimes reported in modern books. The author says: "In order to christianize the Indian nations we should not think ourselves obliged to erect measures to effect an alteration in that way of civil life that they have been used to for ages immortal. If they should not dwell in stock houses, or wear clothes, or labor in such employments, or come into the use of such modes of civility, as are common among us, I know not that it should be any hindrance to the Gospel among them." (p. 260).

I commend the book to those attending the Berlin congress on evangelism this fall. Let them reflect what once was. I commend it also to those who, in an effort to unite all churches, emphasize the ministry to the whole man at the expense of the proclamation of the Gospel. I thank Dr. Weaver for delivering this message in the present age out of the past.
